New Year's Resolution: Building a Healthy and Inclusive City

Featuring author, facilitator and planner

American cities are doing better than they have in decades, redeveloping, renewing and becoming choice places to live. Currently, the focus is mainly on physical design, but behind the façade and the walls, people may actually be losing economic ground because of the lack of equity and value obtained from these changes. In fact, much building under the rubric of New Urbanism may be displacing the most vulnerable communities and reducing their opportunities. When you redevelop a neighborhood, you must recognize the impacts on the local inhabitants and develop explicit policies to allow them to share in the benefit. What types of economic, social and environmentally sensitive policies best guide development? Can we empower residents to understand and control their own futures? What is our role in developing more inclusive cities?
